Dear Worldwide Super Hare,
ALL AT SEA WITH POPEYE
We are in desperate need of critical advice and guidance as another of our "experienced hares" and Elf & Safe Tea executive has gone adrift!
Next time you see Popeye, please take him under your wing, and impart the fruits of your wisdom:

- Checks to be found, not hidden in ditches or behind bushes, and
 - NOT by the din of the main road!
 - Trail visible, not on the backs of trees - did he lay it backwards?
- Blimey, the Dogs of the Cobham Hood shit all over the place, don't they? And their pompous nouveau riche handlers are too up themselves to bend and scoop!

Unfortunately Petal & I were late owing to yet another bloody "cycle event" and we set off at speed until the flour ran out. At his point our only clues could be obtained from Herr Flick, Low Profile, Teddy Bear and ABBA, who were wandering around aimlessly as if they were in the gardens of some posh asylum.

Clutching Hand – what became of Clutching Hand? - set a much simpler trail from this over-crowded car park. Popeye was a good deal more ambitious, with even his start a quite unexpected crossing of a busy road., and indeed his finish a wholly counter-intuitive crossing of the A3 for the umpteenth time on his trail. And you had to find that if you wanted the sip stop. A good many of us did not, bemused by Le Pro rambling on about seeing Atalanta and Simple finding the solution. He was right, they did, but in a direction diametrically opposite to what he remembered. Eventually RHUM, J. Arthur and I, from the original cluster of front runners, plus Master Bates from a splinter group which included Mother Brown and a friend of Atalanta's, who had joined us while we dithered, made our own way back using satellite navigation – actually a rather scenic route, rich in dogs accompanying Sunday morning strollers.

But the real hero of the morning had been Dr Death. (I assume his handle comes from a putative resemblance to David Owen. What became of David Owen?) Time and again while we searched Surrey for solutions to the checks, Dr Death would confidently stride in exactly the right direction. He is often good at this, but today he surpassed himself. To be honest I now forget what he did while we paid undue heed to Le Pro. Even such strong characters as 'IsKnees and Chastity Belt were influenced by this indecision.

Earlier I mentioned Atalanta and Simple, in the absence of Blunder and Bean well and away the fastest on today's trail. At the very first check Simple went off in the right direction., over the first of our many bridges, but failed to go far enough. It was not till Atalanta returned from checking elsewhere and revisited Simple's bridge that the flour was found.

So. A right-hander, which early on included that very well-trodden footpath beside the Mole (we usually start from the suburb of Esher called West End0 and then back immediately above that some footpath. So far so well known. But then Popeye's trail became much more original and challenging, and this is where Dr Death's confidence came into its own. I am not sure how long those who found the sip stop had been in when our group got back, but we had taken 1 hour 40 minutes, a very sensible length for a trail.

Visitors to St Paul's Cathedral are greeted by a tribute to Wren: "Si monumentum requieris, circumspice". If you seek a monument, look around. Now, at one time Latin was pronounced here in a way that permitted a joke on the last word: "Sir, come, spy, see!" Nowadays this would have to be "Kir coomb speak eh" The French are not convinced by English Latinists, and the Italians are enraged – to them, Latin and Italian are the same languages, and so Latin must have been pronounced as Italian is now..How does one know how a dead language was spoken? The answer is surprising: from spelling mistakes. If for example you find a K written instead of a C, you know the C was hard. Church Latin conforms much more closely to the old fashioned pronunciation; you would raise many eyebrows in the surrounding pews by pronouncing "Virgine" as Weir-geen-eh. And if you think Church Latin belongs to the past, I have heard a little old lady, a black South African, belting out the Credo in Latin with all the confidence of a chorister..

 We were then joined by Blunderbus and Beanstalk, who were equally confounded until Ms B declared that there had been a check, cunningly concealed. We eventually crossed the A3, but soon ran out of flour again. Such was the din from the road that we had to hug each other to be within earshot. Then Petal spotted three dots, so we concluded that there must have been another hidden check. This one was Dick Dastardly as we tried following the dots in both directions but could not find another. Blunderbus then went off perpendicular to the dots and signalled that he was back on trail.

And so it went on, most of the marks were the backs of trees and an occasional three dots indicated that we'd over-run yet another check. You can tell from the attached trail that there was not much plain sailing as there was a lot of milling about when the check wasn't straight on. We were convinced that our pace would be sufficient to catch up more than just the lunatic fringe, but alas, despite following most of the trail, we failed at the third bridge crossing and decided to head home by separate ways on the false assumption that by spreading out one of us might find some more flour.

Back at the circle, Popeye professed that he had been determined to scupper the front runners, so he was disappointed that Stevie Blunder & Ms Bean had not been there at the start. Anyway, he managed that big time with his invisible trail. Petal is thinking of taking up gymnastics having managed a salchow and a double somersault on a couple of the safety hazards along the way. I think Tequi'over must have done so too, 'coz I licked his wounds while he served the beer.

Where's Wally when you need him, eh?
